The boys are very useful to the narrator. They are very willing to satisfy all that the narrator requires. They are also found selling newspapers, by the narrator, one stormy night. One day, when the narrator asks if he can help them in any, they say they will be very grateful if they get a lift to the nearby village Poleta. Although it doesn't come in the narrator's way he takes them there. The boys get down in a building and ask the narrator to wait in a nearby cafe, until they return within an hour.

Eagerness leads the narrator to follow the boys up to a place which is actually a hospital. On peeping through a room, led by a nurse, he realizes that boys are talking to a girl who resembles them. He does not feel like intruding and thus asks the nurse the details about the boys. This is when the nurse tells him their heart rending story about their father being killed in a war and their home being destroyed in the war and their sister suffering from tuberculosis. The brothers live in a shelter and literally starve only so that they can pay for their sister's treatment. So keeping a secret and helping their sister they have shown that war has not shaken their spirit. They are noble and gentle and great human beings in their own special yet subtle way. This story distinctly talks about how true the amplification says : 'Where there is will there's a way'.
