Q.2

One night Dick decided he could stand it no more. Early the next morning before the cook was up, he set out with his cat to seek his fortune elsewhere. The two of them walked as far as Holloway, on their way out of London, then Dick sat down on a stone to rest. It was the first of November, All Saint's Day, and the church bells were ringing. As Dick sat and listened it seemed they were ringing out a message for him :

Turn again Whittington,
Thou worthy citizen,
Lord Mayor of London.

"Lord Mayor of London ?" said Dick. "I should like to be Lord Mayor and ride in a fine coach. I can put up with a few scoldings from the cook if that is what is in store for me." So Dick and his cat retraced their steps to Mr Fitzwarren's house. Luckily they were able to slip back before they had been missed.

Now Mr Fitzwarren used to send ships far across the sea to trade with other countries. He would load a ship with goods for the captain and ship's crew to sell in faraway places and then they would bring back goods that could be sold at home.

One day he called his household together. "I am sending a ship to the African coast to trade," he said. "Would any of you like to send something of yours on it? You can then share in the profits if the voyage is successful." Everyone produced something except for Dick, who had nothing to offer. "Have you nothing of your own, Dick ?" asked Mr Fitzwarren kindly, and Dick replied, "Only my cat."

"Then let your cat go on the ship," said Mr Fitzwarren. His daughter, Alice, said,

"Dick loves his cat. Let me put something in for him." But her father said, "No, it must be his, not something belonging to someone else."
